

LATIN AMERICAN JOURNAL OF TRADE POLICY

The Latin American Journal of Trade Policy is an official publication of the Institute of International Studies of the University of Chile. Following an open access policy, the full version of the journal, and individual papers, is available on-line free of charge.

The Latin American Journal of Trade Policy (LAJTP) focusses on trade policy issues in Latin America from a multidisciplinary perspective. A particular aim of the journal is to reduce the gap between academia and policymakers. As such, the journal encourages paper submissions on topics related to trade policy formulation, implementation and evaluation; international trade agreements and their impact, including WTO issues and preferential trade agreements; Latin American regional integration processes; and, bilateral trade and investment relations both between Latin American countries and with overseas economies.

The journal is interested in publishing papers that draw policy relevant conclusions from academic research, that confront theoretical models with the Latin American experience and that use the specific regional experiences to develop new models. Particular consideration is given to empirical articles using quantitative, qualitative, or a mixed methods approach.

We encourage the submission of articles that:

- Contribute to existing knowledge of trade policy making in Latin America;
- Develop and advance pertinent theories to the region;
- Deal with the gap between academia and policy making;
- Utilize quantitative, qualitative, and mixed method approaches.

The Latin American Journal of Trade Policy (LAJTP) is indexed in the Latindex collection. This indexation reflects the effort and work that has been devoted to the creation of this journal and the consolidation of our line of work in trade policy.

The editorial team will continue working to develop the LAJTP, waiting in the coming months to begin the indexation processes in DOAJ, Scielo and Scopus.
